Chaos after break?

Helping your Complex Learner manage routines

As individuals who can be anxious, distracted, or rigid, Complex Learners are especially in need of routine to make their lives predictable and safe. At the same time, their interferences to learning get in the way of establishing and maintaining this structure. Here are a few ways parents and teachers can help...

Sensory Challenges and Sensible Solutions

Some children resist participating in family and school activities or respond in unusual ways to ordinary sensations of touch and movement, sights and sounds. Because of Sensory Processing Disorder (SPD), they don't behave as we expect - not because they won't, but because they can't. And then, they grow up. Therapists, parents, teachers, and other professionals who care for these individuals can deal with their out-of-sync behavior by incorporating "just-right" sensory experiences into their daily life.
